

Integrated Customer-Centric Strategies

The Navigator

ISM NEWS & INSIGHTS - APRIL 2017

“Contextual Relevancy”: The Key to Reaching Your Customers

If you remember nothing else from this article, remember this: to create increased engagement with your customers and prospects, you must meet them where they are.

There are lots of obvious places where you can engage with customers: on your website or social media community, while they are searching on Google, when they talk with consultants or opinion leaders, through your Contact Center, during a visit to your store, or while they are researching your products/services and those of your competition.

In fact, more than 70% of today’s customers have made their ‘buy’ decision prior to having spoken to anyone from sales or customer service. It is your job to serve up ‘contextual’ information to the right person at the right time – their way, not yours – during their buying window.

According to recent G2 Crowd research, 71% agreed or strongly agreed that “it would be useful for vendor sales reps to proactively engage with me earlier in the purchase process with relevant information,” and 72% agree or strongly agree that “I appreciate vendors who contact me with relevant and contextual information.”

Here’s what your customers are asking for:

- “Be relevant in all that you say and do with me.”
- “Meet me where I am, in whatever channel I prefer.”
- “Know me, because I am unique and what to be treated accordingly.”
- “Make me feel special by being contextually relevant.”
- “Provide me with control and be transparent about my options.”
- “Give me help when I need it.”

Being contextually relevant is not easy since it is impacted by roles, relationships, time, location, knowledge, weather, business processes, sentiment, intent, digital acumen, and more. Contextual relevance is particularly challenging in our increasingly digital world, where a customer's attention span is short and competition is but a click away.

I leave you with this thought: your mission – should you be willing to accept it – is to know your customers so well that you are always there when they need you to be there. Not a small task, but a very important one. In my next CRM Magazine column, I will offer several examples of contextual relevancy and a recipe for you to achieve excellence in this area. I'm also devoting one of my keynotes to this important topic at this year's CRM Evolution event in Washington, D.C.

Best Regards,

Barton Goldenberg
President

301-656-8448

bgoldenberg@ismguide.com

www.bartongoldenberg.com

Join Barton and LiveRamp in Austin, TX - April 18th

LiveRamp's RampUp is hitting the road to bring new data-driven marketing strategies and tactics to marketers—one city at a time.

Join Barton for his keynote address: The Future of Marketing and Advertising in 2030. Register

Experience two of Barton's popular Executive Bootcamps 2017 - April 24th-26th in Washington, DC

Friends of ISM can save up to 33% on a full Conference Pass. Register here to VIP discount.

To learn more about Barton's two keynote presentations on Monday, April 24th Customer-Centric Strategy— How to Thrive in the Digital Deluge, and Integrated Centric Strategy— Your Road Map to Success in 2030, click here.

If you no longer wish to receive email from us, click here to unsubscribe.

ISM, Inc.
6900 Wisconsin Ave., Suite 505
Bethesda, MD 20815, USA
(310) 656-8448
Contact@ismguide.com